Summary

Most people see compliance as a checkbox, I see it as a design challenge. My career started in chartered accountancy firms in India, working across tax consulting, statutory audits, and financial reporting. I learned the technical foundations, understanding financial structures, navigating regulations, assessing risks. But what fascinated me wasn't just identifying problems. I wanted to solve them. In 2017, I moved into startups as Finance Manager at Quintype Technologies (media-tech SaaS, HQ at New York) and Clover Ventures (agritech). This shift changed everything. I wasn't just reviewing controls, I was building them from scratch. Designing accounting systems, preparing for investor funding, managing cash flow across states, negotiating with vendors, detecting fraud, creating scalable processes with limited resources. Startups taught me to be resourceful, pragmatic, and focused on what actually moves the needle. After earning my MBA from The University of Edinburgh in 2022, I joined Intel Corporation as Senior Risk & Controls Auditor for EMEA and Asia (occasionally). Now I'm on the other side- identifying risks and testing controls across Fortune 100 multi-tier partner ecosystems, managing SOX compliance, conducting on-site assessments globally. I see where controls break down in complex operations and understand what works in theory versus practice. This dual perspective is valuable. I've been the tax consultant advising from outside, the finance manager building systems from inside, and the auditor validating from across the table. I've worked in resource-constrained startups where agility is critical, and in enterprise environments where managing complexity at scale is the challenge. My strength is bridging the gap between compliance requirements and operational realities, designing systems that meet regulatory standards while supporting business objectives. I work well in environments that evolve quickly and require both structure and flexibility. I've collaborated with stakeholders across functions and geographies, from negotiating with vendors to conducting assessments with global teams to presenting findings to senior management. I hold an MBA from The University of Edinburgh and pursued Chartered Accountant from ICAI. I've worked across tax, audit, finance management, controls design, and risk assessment, in CA firms, startups, and Fortune 100 companies.
